Open the door to the winners of our 8th annual Superior Interiors Design Awards

There's a hilltop refuge that incorporates natural materials to be one with its surroundings. There's a modern interpretation of a barn made to an open airy space for family gatherings. A large space is made more friendly and inviting through smart design. And then there's a group of projects-one a historically sensitive remodel, another a new construction project with old-time craftsmanship, and a thoroughly contemporary duplex redux-all completed by a small firm in Slippery Rock (see "Inherited Traits," page 54) that garnered an unprecedented five awards.

It's a stellar crop that we recognize in our eighth annual Superior Interiors Home Design Contest, co sponsored by the Pittsburgh chapters of the American Society of Interior Designers (ASID) and the American Institute of Architects (AIA).

Our jury from the Cleveland chapters of those organizations had a tough task sorting through a record number of entries. The result: Some novel designs that may spur your imagination.

The clients were looking to build their "final house" before retiring, a home east of Pittsburgh that would serve as a quiet family getaway for their three grown children. After having secured a parcel of land that offered stunning vistas, it was important to use natural materials. The living room features framing and timber from a salvaged barn. Floors are made of recycled hemlock. "This is a wonderful space to get back to nature," says architect David Celento.

JUDGES' COMMENTS:

Beautifully
detailed. There's a connection with the exterior that works well. There's a strong contrast
with contemporary materials set
against a rustic background. This would be a fun
house to live in.

Custom-made grid work carries the Arts and Crafts movement feel throughout the house.
